

General Functioning

Colt's No. M2 is an air-cooled gas engine capable of firing 600 rounds a minute.

As a gas engine, it is necessary to "cock" it manually to cock the gun. The cocking mechanism is located at the rear portion of the gun barrel.

When the burning powder violently generates gas which expands the gas case and barrel starts a tremendous pressure. This pressure forces the bullet out of the barrel. At the moment the bullet is still within the cartridge case and which has a tremendous force of five tons pushes the chamber toward the rear. Each time the cartridge case out of the chamber toward the rear. Each time the bolt positively locked against the rear of the cartridge of the

When the cartridge is fired the force of recoil causes the barrel, barrel extension, and breech to the remaining portion backward a short distance. See Figure 10A. This distance allows the bolt from the barrel and barrel extension, and the bolt carrier back forward toward the rear against a spring. This spring serves to drive the bolt forward again. The empty case is withdrawn by the bolt from the barrel chamber and the next cartridge is extracted from the supply tank.

The long rearward motion of the bolt is checked and as it stops forward the empty case is ejected and the next cartridge is moved into the barrel chamber. See Figure 10B. The bolt having checked the short rearward motion of the barrel and extension, the arrangement prevents the case from being driven toward the rear. This motion locks the bolt to the barrel, thus again barrel causes the heavy gas to strike the cartridge, providing a means of resetting the next in the cycle continues as long as trigger action is maintained and as long as oxygen is supplied.
