Final report Michigan. Public Service Commission,1991 Do Energy Efficiency Investments Deliver at the Right Time? Judson Boomhower, Lucas W. Davis, Andrew Campbell, University of California, Berkeley. Energy Institute at Haas, 2017 Electricity cannot be cost effectively stored even for short periods of time Consequently wholesale electricity prices vary widely across hours of the day with peak prices frequently exceeding off peak prices by a factor of ten or more Most analyses of energy efficiency policies ignore this variation focusing on total energy savings without regard to when those savings occur In this paper we demonstrate the importance of this distinction using novel evidence from a rebate program for air conditioners in Southern California We estimate electricity savings using hourly smart meter data and show that savings tend to occur during hours when the value of electricity is high This significantly increases the overall value of the program especially once we account for the large capacity payments received by generators to guarantee their availability in high demand hours We then compare this estimated savings profile with engineering based estimates for this program as well as a variety of alternative energy efficiency investments The results illustrate a surprisingly large amount of variation in economic value across investments The African Journal of Finance and Management ,2016
