

CHAPTER THREE

RESEARCH METHODOLOGY

3.1 Introduction

This chapter outlined the methodology that was used in conducting the research. The chapter presented the research design, target population and sampling techniques that were employed. It further identified the data collection instruments that were employed in the research and the procedures for data collection. It concluded by describing how data analysis was conducted and the output.

3.2 Research Design

Research design is the plan and structure of investigation so conceived as to obtain answers to research questions. The plan is the overall scheme or program of the research (Robson, 2002). A descriptive research design was used in this study. The major purpose of descriptive research design is to provide information on characteristics of a population or phenomenon (Mugenda & Mugenda, 2003). Descriptive research is used as a precursor to quantitative research designs as it provides the general overview giving some valuable pointers as to what variables are worth testing quantitatively.

A cross-section survey was used for this study because it employs a single point of data collection for each participant, it is cheaper to undertake compared to longitudinal survey and the results from the sample are inferred to the larger population. In addition, some extraneous factors were manifested in the observed change other than the independent variable concerned.

3.3 Target Population

Currently, there are over 1403 companies that have their product offerings listed and certified manufacturers under T.b.s (Tanzania bureau of standard) certificate scheme by march 2019. It happens that because there are a large number of companies in Tanzania, the researcher decided to concentrate on those in Arusha Region. The target population was the 5 manufacturing companies located in Arusha Regional.
