Natural Selection Theory in Non-majors' Biology Dianne Leigh Anderson,2003 Evolution by natural selection is the dominant and unifying theme in biology yet many college students hold alternative conceptions about the topic even after completing general biology To develop effective instructional strategies and track conceptual understanding it is useful to have a detailed assessment tool easily used with large classes This study presents the Conceptual Inventory of Natural Selection CINS a distractor driven twenty item multiple choice test that assesses understanding of ten concepts related to natural selection biotic potential stable populations limited natural resources limited survival variation within a population variation inherited differential survival change in populations origin of variation and origin of species Development refinement and field testing of individual CINS items are presented and validity readability reliability and factor analysis of the CINS are described There was significant correlation between student performance on the posttest CINS and end of semester interviews suggesting that the CINS is a useful classroom tool The CINS was used as both a pretest and posttest to determine relative difficulty of the concepts among college students The three most challenging concepts were random origin of variation how populations change over time due to changing proportions of alleles and how new species originate Many students chose distractors including need as a driving force Results support the use of non traditional methods as only students in such classes demonstrated any improvement on the CINS posttest Pre and posttesting with the CINS was also used to assess relative effectiveness of using two types of supplemental reading materials selections from narrative non textbook sources or from other general biology textbooks in a general biology course These results suggest that specific content of readings was more important than style of the readings Implications for teaching both students and pre service teachers are described Biological Science, an Ecological Approach Biological Sciences Curriculum Study,1992

Chan, 1995 Some recent investigations have suggested that a breakdown in the structure of semantic knowledge is an attribute that characterizes the cognitive deficits of Alzheimer's disease AD Two studies were conducted to examine the organization of the semantic knowledge by multidimensional scaling clustering and Pathfinder analyses The results suggested that AD patients exhibited a significant deterioration in the structure of their semantic knowledge The organization of their semantic knowledge is characterized by abnormal clusterings of concepts and atypical strength of associations In addition while AD patients focus primarily on concrete conceptual information NC subjects stress abstract conceptual knowledge in organizing concepts Given that semantic knowledge is presumably stored and distributed in the neocortex I and my colleagues hypothesized that the observed structural alteration is most likely a reflection of the degeneration in the patients neocortical systems To test this hypothesis I extended the previous experiment to include Huntington's disease HD and Amnesic AM patients These two groups of patients were chosen because they share some common neurological symptoms with AD patients and yet their neocortical systems are relatively intact HD like AD is a dementing illness but the pathological change of HD involves primarily the subcortical region AM like AD is characterized by impairment in learning new information but the pathological change in AM is focused in the mesial temporal region If the structural alteration in semantic knowledge is a unique characteristic of AD but is not an attribute of all forms of dementing illness or all kinds of memory disorder then the organization of semantic knowledge of HD and AM patients will be essentially normal The results of this experiment suggested that the semantic networks in AD patients but not those in HD and AM patients are characterized by abnormal clustering of concepts and atypical strength of associations In addition while HD and AM subjects like control subjects categorize concepts primarily along an abstract conceptual dimension AD patients focus on a concrete perceptual dimension in categorizing concepts These results support the notion that the integrity of the neocortex is necessary for organizing semantic knowledge Forest Genetics, 2002 Advances in Linkage Analysis Gary Chen, 2006 The Commonwealth Forestry Review, 1976
