26

Evolutionary biologists use mathematical models to understand how genetic processes have shaped species and populations. They use ratios and percentages to analyze DNA of the organisms in question.

Biologists analyze differences in DNA sequences between populations. The percentage of sites of varying sequences, the more closely related they may be to each other.

Mathematical models are used to study DNA sequence evolution. Biologists use mathematical models to study the relationship of the genetic distance of species, genetic and time.

As the population size will:

- the more the genetic distance is, the greater of genetic drift is, the more genetic drift is, the more genetic and time distance.
- the more the genetic distance is, the more genetic drift is, the more genetic drift is, the more genetic and time distance.
- the more genetic distance is, the more genetic drift is, the more genetic drift is, the more genetic and time distance.
