

Summary War Horse Chapter 4 -8

War Horse opens with an "Author's Note" that calls attention to a painting of a horse; this work hangs in a rustic schoolhouse that has been repurposed as a town hall. Although many of the gathered villagers do not often pay the picture much attention, some do occasionally look over the inscription that identifies the horse and the portraitist. This painting depicts a horse named Joey, and it was painted by Captain James Nicholls in autumn of 1914. As a narrative, War Horse is an act of commemoration. The text is designed to keep alive the once-faded memory of Joey and of those who accompanied him through the trials of World War I.

The opening of Chapter 4 finds Albert's father leading Joey to the village, where Joey discerns men in uniform and hears the sounds of a military band. Albert's father hands Joey off to an officer, Captain Nicholls, who is impressed with Joey's physique and bearing. Although Joey remains calm while he is being inspected, he begins to panic after the purchase is finalized, when he realizes that Albert's father has truly abandoned him. Just then, Albert rushes up. The boy speaks to Captain Nicholls, who confirms that Joey has indeed been sold to the army and sympathetically explains that Albert (who wishes to go to war himself) is too young to enlist. Captain Nicholls also promises to take good care of Joey personally. With this assurance, Albert leaves.

Chapter 5 begins with a description of Joey's early, uneasy adaptation to cavalry training. The new routines that Joey must fall into are physically demanding, and are made all the harsher by the temperament of Joey's rider, Colonel Samuel Perkins. Though neither violent nor short-tempered, Perkins is determined and demanding. Fortunately, Joey finds solace in the visits of Captain Nicholls, who talks to Joey in a soothing manner and relates his thoughts about the war. The officer also draws Joey's portrait in the course of these sessions.

One day, Captain Nicholls is in Joey's quarters, talking to the horse about the impending battles: while many of the soldiers are convinced that the war will be quick and that the British will prevail, Captain Nicholls and another officer, Captain Jamie Stewart, fear that the war will be drawn-out and deadly. Colonel Samuel Perkins appears, and Captain Nicholls urges him to treat Joey in a more pleasant and considerate manner. Now receiving much kinder treatment from the Colonel, Joey settles into the final few stages of training, which culminate in maneuvers on Salisbury Plain. When the regiment breaks into a final charge, Joey races alongside Captain Stewart's own horse, an imposing black stallion named Topthorn. Neither horse proves decisively faster than the other; these two exceptional animals are stabled together before the troops set out for France.
