

Reflection papers

Marco Kuhlmann

What are reflection papers?

A reflection paper is an academic essay in which you reflect on a course experience, such as a lab series or a project. To reflect (in the sense in which this word is used here) means that you critically examine your experience and explicitly articulate what you have learned.

Why write reflection papers?

Writing a reflection paper offers you the opportunity to process an experience and think about how it has helped your learning. As Gibbs \(1988\) writes, '[i]t is not sufficient simply to have an experience in order to learn. Without reflecting upon this experience it may quickly be forgotten or its learning potential lost.' Reflective writing also trains your analytical skills, as it requires you to link your experience to the course content. For me (the examiner), a reflection paper is a means to assess to what extent the experience has helped you achieve the learning objectives for a part of a course.

How to write reflection papers?

There are many ways to write reflection papers, but in my courses I ask you to structure your paper into three parts as follows:

1. Describe your experience (lab series, project), in fair detail and as objectively as possible. Focus on things that let you illustrate what you have learned.
2. Examine your experience and link it to the relevant course content. See below for prompts that will help you with this.
3. Articulate your learning. Respond to the following prompts: What did you learn? How, specifically, did you learn that? Why does this learning matter?
