Digital Interactive Installations Frank Blum, 2007-04-20 Inhaltsangabe Abstract The arts have always been influenced by new evolving technologies A certain aesthetic turning point was brought about by the silent algorithmic revolution we have not hardly noticed as the curators of the Centre of Art and Media ZKM in Karlsruhe Germany propose with their current exhibition At present barely any part of social life is not influenced by these decision making processes algorithms habitually executed by our computer devices The radical changes this revolution causes for all of us are incalculable However we should not forget that algorithms a well defined set of technical instructions with a finite number of rules designed to solve a specific problem have been incorporated as a creative instrument in the work of Albrecht D uerer and other artists since the late middle ages The strict application of algorithms in art ultimately led to works explicitly integrating the recipient into the creative process eventually culminating in the new media arts Today s art practices transform observers into users Emerging with the changing paradigm is a new type of creator of cultural artefacts This has been accompanied now for more than two decades by a fruitful collaborative atmosphere between the formerly strictly separated traditions of art and science More often than not artists like such as the pioneers Christa Sommerer Laurent Mignonneau and Jeffrey Shaw are at the same time scientific researchers found in institutional laboratories as heads of larger teams which include programmers engineers and scientists of various different disciplines They develop new hard and software technologies themselves All in all this development places not only an inestimable number of creative tools in the hands of the artist but a highly dynamic and hybrid field that forms new areas like telepresence art biocybernetic art robotics Net art space art experiments in nanotechnology artificial or A life art creating virtual agents and avatars datamining mixed realities and database supported art which all explore the technologies of tomorrow Not long ago artists sought to explore software coding as the foundation of their expression and as a material with specific properties Like Max MSP and others new alternative programming environments based on a graphical interface concept facilitate bridging the gap between art and technology and bring the artists back more control over the creative
