KEY CONCEPTS

- 49.1 Nervous systems consist of circuits of neurons and supporting cells.
- 49.2 The vertebrate brain is regionally specialized.
- 49.3 The cerebral cortex controls voluntary movement and cognitive functions.
- 49.4 Changes in synaptic connections underlie memory and learning.
- 49.5 Many nervous system disorders can be explained in molecular terms.

Command and Control Center

What happens in your brain when you solve a math problem or listen to music? Answering such a question was for a long time nearly unimaginable. The human brain contains an estimated 10^{11} (100 billion) neurons. Interconnecting these brain cells are circuits more complex than those of even the most powerful supercomputers. However, thanks in part to several exciting new technologies, scientists have begun to explore the cellular mechanisms that underlie thought and emotion.

One breakthrough came with the development of powerful imaging techniques that reveal activity in the working brain. Researchers can monitor multiple areas of the human brain while a subject is performing various tasks, such as speaking, looking at pictures, or forming a mental image of a person's face. They can use these techniques to look for a correlation between a particular task and activity in specific brain areas.

A more recent advance in exploring the brain relies on a method for expressing random combinations of colored proteins in brain cells—such that each cell shows up in a different color. The result is a “rainbow” like the one in Figure 49.1, which highlights neurons in the brain of a mouse. In this image, each neuron expresses one of more than 90 different color combinations of four fluorescent proteins.
