

Using models in science

Models are important ways of representing scientific concepts and ideas visually using a simplistic version. They help to visualize trends and patterns in data and can be used to show the complexity of relationships within a system.

Models can describe the relationship between variables, such as the surface area to volume of a cell, or comparing cell sizes to each other.

Scientific information can be represented visually or modelled in many different ways. Representations vary widely, depending on what type of information is being conveyed. The ability to describe and explain visual representations helps you to communicate information about the biological principles, concepts, and processes they involve.

Plant cell model

The effect of increasing size

- ▶ The size and shape of a cell reflects its function and the need for essential molecules to move in and out. The greater the spherical diameter of a cell, the more material it contains and the further molecules have to move in order to reach the centre. At the same time, its metabolic requirements for raw materials increase. Molecules diffusing into the cell are used up faster than they can be supplied and may not reach the cell's centre, leaving it starved of essential molecules, e.g. oxygen.
- ▶ The transport of substances across membranes allows cells to exchange matter with their environment. Simple diffusion and transport involving membrane proteins are both affected by cell size and shape because these things affect the amount of surface area available relative to the cell's volume. The larger a cell, the more materials, e.g. oxygen, it needs, and the further molecules need to move to reach their destination within the cell.
- ▶ A cell's surface area is important in determining how many molecules it can obtain. Its volume is important in determining how quickly molecules can reach certain parts of the cell. Surface area to volume ratio is therefore crucial to cell function.

(a) 2 cm cube

(b) 3 cm cube

(c) 4 cm cube

(d) 5 cm cube

4. The diagram above shows four hypothetical cells of different sizes. They range from a small 2 cm cube to a 5 cm cube (not to scale). Explain in general terms how a change in size effects the surface area and the volume of the cell:

5. Use the formulae provided on the previous page to calculate the surface area (SA), volume (V), and the ratio of surface area to volume (SA:V) for each of the four cuboidal cells (a)-(d) above. Show your calculations.

(a) SA: _____	V: _____	SA:V _____
(b) SA: _____	V: _____	SA:V _____
(c) SA: _____	V: _____	SA:V _____
(d) SA: _____	V: _____	SA:V _____

6. What are the advantages of using a model to demonstrate the surface-area-to-volume relationship of cells:
