Shays Rebellion Aftermath

Due to Shays Rebellion, where a group of farmers stormed the local court system seeking to shut it down in 1786, a group of political leaders got together to draft a document that could establish rules that would govern the United States. Since the United States was a new nation, many citizens were concerned that it would collapse and eventually be overtaken. Many citizens moved to the United States in order to escape the laws they felt oppressed them in their previous countries.

Forming a New Nation

The colonial leaders organized a convention to establish new rules for governing the United States. In order to do this, they studied the political systems of ancient Greece and ancient Rome. Both ancient civilizations had a form of democracy where citizens had a voice as to how their nations would be run. During the 1700s, many of the countries that the American citizens immigrated from were run by monarchies or the wealthy elite. Citizens had no rights. The United States government had to be organized in a way in which the government did not have too much power and citizens would have rights to protect themselves.

Common Core Standard RI.1 Cite Textual Evidence

1. What did the leaders do before they created new laws?
  - a. They researched the laws of other nations.
  - b. They modeled the country after monarchies.
  - c. They organized government power.

Common Core Standard RI.6 Author's Viewpoint & Purpose

2. What is the author's purpose for writing this?
  - a. To inform the reader about how laws in the United States were developed
  - b. To persuade readers to investigate democratic systems
  - c. To describe the steps that have to be taken in order to reorganize a government system
