

Chapter 34 - Circulation and Gas Exchange

34.1 Circulatory systems link exchange surfaces with cells throughout the body

- The molecular trade that an animal carries out with its environment, gaining O_2 and nutrients while shedding CO_2 and other waste products, must ultimately involve every cell in the body.
- Small molecules can move between cells and their immediate surroundings by diffusion.
- In cnidarians, a central gastrovascular cavity functions in the distribution of substances throughout the body and in digestion.
- Planarians and most other flatworms survive without a circulatory system since their gastrovascular cavity and flat body are well suited for exchange with the environment.
- A circulatory system has three basic components: a circulatory fluid, a set of interconnecting vessels, and a muscular pump, the heart.
- In an open circulatory system, the circulatory fluid, called hemolymph, is also the interstitial fluid that bathes body cells.
- In a closed circulatory system, a circulatory fluid called blood is confined to vessels and is distinct from the interstitial fluid.
- The lower hydrostatic pressures typically associated with open circulatory systems make them less costly than closed systems in terms of energy expenditure.
- The benefits of closed circulatory systems include relatively high blood pressure, which enables the effective delivery of O_2 and nutrients to the cells of larger and more active animals.
- The closed circulatory system of humans and other vertebrates is often called the cardiovascular system.
- Arteries carry blood from the heart to organs throughout the body. Within organs, arteries branch into arterioles. These small vessels convey blood to capillaries, microscopic vessels with very thin, porous walls.
- Networks of these vessels, called capillary beds, infiltrate tissues, passing within a few cells diameters of every cell in the body.
- At their downstream end, capillaries converge into venules, and venules converge into veins, the vessels that carry blood back to the heart.
- The chambers that receive blood entering the heart are called atria. The chambers responsible for pumping blood out of the heart are called ventricles.
- In bony fishes, rays, and sharks, the heart consists of two chambers: an atrium and a ventricle. The blood passes through the heart once in each complete circuit, an arrangement called single circulation. The blood that leaves the heart passes through two sets of capillary beds before returning to the heart.

Figure 34.4 Comparative circulatory systems of vertebrates. (A) Single circuit: an example of single circulation in which blood passes through the heart once in each complete circuit. (B) Single circuit: an example of single circulation in which blood passes through the heart once in each complete circuit. (C) Double circuit: an example of double circulation in which blood passes through the heart twice in each complete circuit. (D) Double circuit: an example of double circulation in which blood passes through the heart twice in each complete circuit.

- The circulatory systems of amphibians, reptiles, and mammals have two circuits, an arrangement called double circulation. The pumps for the two circuits are combined into a single organ, the heart. One pump, the right side of the heart, delivers oxygen-poor blood to the capillary beds of the gas exchange tissues, where there is a net movement of O_2 into the blood and of CO_2 out of the blood.
