the literature Understanding these linkages at the symptom level is crucial to interrupting this sequence The present study uses a prospective longitudinal design and multiple group second order parallel process latent growth curve modeling to examine the relations between the developmental trajectories of antisocial behavior alcohol use depression and anxiety symptomology across adolescence and their interrelations a first of its kind Each outcome was assessed using multiple measures at four time points over a 5 year period in a sample of 451 young adolescents beginning in the 8 th grade age M 14 08 SD 0 42 In line with previous research a significant association was found among all the symptom domains studied However fewer longitudinal relations were found between the different emotional and behavioral problems than previous research suggests The results of this study clearly show that conduct problems are a risk factor for increases in depression and anxiety And anxiety was a strong indicator of subsequent problems with depression There was no evidence that either antisocial behavior or alcohol use influenced the trajectory of the other Theoretical explanations for these associations are reviewed The present study sheds new light on the codeveloping trajectories of four problems commonly experienced by adolescents The findings of this study can help aid preventive efforts because symptoms of one disorder can be used to identify and intervene with populations at risk for symptoms of a secondary disorder With this knowledge these efforts have the potential to greatly reduce costs to human life and society
