Introduction

The study of microbiology requires not only an academic understanding of the microscopic world but also a practical understanding of lab techniques and procedures used to identify, control, and manipulate microorganisms. The proper identification of a microorganism is important in the medical, industrial, and pharmaceutical fields. In this lab report, lab techniques and procedures learned during this course were performed to assess practical knowledge in microbiology. If I understand the methods and lab techniques that I learned during the semester, then, I will be able to explain the tests that I performed, properly identify my unknown, and give a background on the characteristics of my unknown organism.

Materials and Methods

1. Negative stain

Materials: microscope slide, inoculating loop, flint Stricker, Bunsen burner, water bottle, bacteria culture, nigrosin, microscope.

Method: A small spot of nigrosine was put on the clean microscope slide. The culture was then aseptically transferred to the spot and spread out thinly and evenly. The smear was later allowed to air dry completely. Lastly, the slide was examined microscopically at 1000X magnification to visualize morphology.

2. Heat-fixed smear
