

The Two Sides of the Legal Drinking Age Argument

5 pages | 1171 words

Today, Carpenter and Dobkin (133) posit that the legal drinking age in the United States of America stands at twenty-one years. As such, it is illegal for not only anyone under that age to consume alcohol, but also for anyone to sell alcohol to persons under the age of twenty-one. Resultantly, this policy has provided one of the most heated debates in the U.S in recent times. That is to say that there are proponents and opponents stating their views concerning the policy. The proponents have been busy outlining the reasons for not lowering the legal drinking age from twenty-one to eighteen years. On the other hand, opponents have also outlined their reasons as to why they believe that lowering the age would serve the American society in a better fashion. Therefore, our paper seeks to provide a detailed analysis of the two sides and make an informed decision as to why everyone should oppose the lowering of the legal drinking age to eighteen years. In the real sense, proponents advocating the noncompliance in lowering the legal drinking age have been citing the numerous harms that have befallen our youths as a result of their indulgence in alcoholism. Realistically, research has proven that the number of traffic crash injuries have increased in areas where the authorities have lowered the legal drinking age. For instance, we may view the happenings that followed when New Zealand reduced the minimum drinking age from the 20-year bracket to 18 years of age. In this case, let us take an example of the study done by Kypros and his team 2006. The team embarked on a study to determine whether the number of traffic crash injuries had reduced since the lowering of the minimum drinking age in 1999 by using participants aged between 15 years and 19 years. Resultantly, they found out that the crash rate of alcohol-related accidents had increased by 12% among young men. Similarly, their female counterparts had experienced an increase of around 51%. According to Kypros et al. (126), all these cases lead to hospitalization of the victims. Additionally, it is important to note that alcoholism leads to other bodily harms that go beyond the physical harms as evidenced by research. For instance, Carpenter and Dobkin (134) claims that proponents of maintaining the legal drinking age have quoted the numerous physical harms that are related to the consumption of alcohol. For instance, the authors quote a study where the participants were individuals aged between 18 years and 25 years. These individuals are said to have taken high levels of alcohol that can only be classified using the terms heavy episodic or binge drinking. Typically, it is worth noting that heavy drinking leads to increased blood alcohol concentrations. For instance, Carpenter and Dobkin state that the act of taking five drinks by anyone with 160 pounds of weight would make the blood alcohol concentration be around 0.12% (Carpenter and Dobkin 134). As a result, such a person would experience moderate impairments in his or her reaction time, coordination, depth perception, peripheral vision,...
